Career day

During the career day, I took the opportunity to explore potential internship options for my 5th semester. One company I've always had in mind is Stuurmen. Although their website only mentions graduation internships, I decided to visit their stand and talk to them directly. I shared details about my studies and my strong interest in branding, and to my surprise, they told me that a 5th-semester internship is indeed possible. I also double-checked their language requirements, and they confirmed that English proficiency is sufficient. They encouraged me to apply through their website, noting that if I pass the interview stages, we would work together to find a suitable assignment that aligns with my interests.

I also visited Handpicked Agencies and discovered that they collaborate with multiple agencies, many of which offer internships that are well-suited for media design and app development students. This broadened my perspective on the types of internships available and the variety of companies I could potentially work with.

Reflection:
I found that attending career days and speaking directly with companies is incredibly valuable. It gives you access to information and opportunities that aren't always visible online. Having real conversations can clear up doubts, uncover new possibilities, and help you make more informed decisions about your future. I now feel more prepared and less anxious about the internship search, as I plan to start applying early next semester, well ahead of the usual end-of-semester rush.
